It's easy to shop local!

Looking for a one-stop-shop? If you want to get all your food shopping in one place, here's how...

Box Schemes on page 10

If you're short of time, join a box scheme to get fresh veg and other produce delivered weekly to your door or a nearby drop-off point.

Farmers' Markets on page 18

Buy a wide range of local goods direct from the producer at one of Oxford's weekly community markets. Most have a café.

Farm Shops on page 20

Go direct to the farm for fruit and veg, preserves and jams, and farm-fresh meat. Depending on the season, pick your own fruit straight from the fields.

Grocery Stores on page 22

These shops have standard opening hours and stock a range of local, organic and ethical fresh foods and store cupboard items.

Online Sales and Home Deliveries

Order online from these producers to get deliveries to your home or nearby collection point. Spot the icons throughout the directory.

Entries are shown in order of their distance from Oxford City Centre so that you can choose to shop on foot or by bike.

The carbon footprint of food

What Oxford eats accounts for around a fifth of its total carbon emissions. The food system of the city is responsible for the equivalent of 380,000 tonnes of carbon dioxide every year.<sup>1</sup> To put that into context, this is twice the emissions arising from all of the cars in the city.

The carbon footprint of our food system is complex because it is made up of many processes - from the production of food and drink, to its transport, packaging and storage, through to the way it is cooked and how much of it we waste.

In addition, our dietary choices, red meat in particular, strongly influence the carbon footprint of food.<sup>1,2,3</sup>

Agriculture

Food production generates a lot of emissions due to the manufacture and use of fertilisers, and the upkeep of livestock. Although the overall environmental impact of organic food may not differ markedly from conventional produce, there is some evidence suggesting that organic farming uses less energy and has lower greenhouse gas emissions than conventional farming.<sup>1,4</sup>

Food Transport

Transporting food contributes to the overall carbon footprint by moderately increasing the overall energy use and greenhouse gas emissions.<sup>1</sup> Our demand for out-of-season produce has driven food imports, which travel long distances to reach the end consumer, further increasing the carbon footprint.

While one percent of food is airfreighted, it commands a 16% share of carbon emissions associated with food transport. Just 53% of food consumed in the UK is produced here and less than one percent of that is local. Less than one percent of the food consumed in Oxford comes directly from local sources. Most of the rest is sourced from within the UK, while 48% comes from overseas.

Wasted Food

Food waste is a major contributor to the overall carbon footprint of food.<sup>1</sup> It has been estimated that an incredible 22%<sup>5</sup> of the food and drink we purchase is wasted - the equivalent of each household throwing out £470 worth of perfectly edible food.

Oxford food facts<sup>1</sup>

- Less than one percent of the food consumed in Oxford comes direct from local sources. 51% is sourced from within the UK, while 48% comes from overseas.
- Oxford spends approximately £450 million on food each year.
- If Oxford's avoidable food and drink waste was eliminated the equivalent of around 57,000 tonnes of carbon dioxide would be saved.

Meat & Dairy

The production of animal-based food is associated with higher greenhouse gas emissions than plant-based foods.<sup>2</sup> Meat production requires considerably more land compared to that required for other food types. For example, an area of land equivalent to one football pitch can produce 0.25 tonnes of beef, one tonne of poultry, or 15 tonnes of fruit and vegetables. Ruminants such as beef and lamb also emit significant levels of methane, a gas with 21 times the climate change-causing potential of carbon dioxide.

Shifting our diets from meat, particularly red meats such as beef and lamb, would free up land currently used for growing animal feed for other purposes, including carbon-absorbing forestry.

How to reduce the carbon footprint of your food

As consumers the power is in our shopping baskets to reduce the carbon arising from our food. Simple choices include eating more seasonally and locally, reducing meat consumption, especially of red meats, and opting for organic foods. These choices can help to lower the impact of food on our environment - not just carbon emissions, but energy and water consumption and its strain on natural ecosystems.

- 1. Food miles - In the vast majority of cases, the fewer the food miles (the distance food has travelled from the point it is produced to the point it is sold or consumed), the lower the carbon footprint of food. In addition, sourcing more of our food locally may stimulate the local economy while improving the diversity and seasonality of the food we eat.
- 2. Food waste - Meal planning, correct storage, getting portion sizes right and creative use of leftovers can all go a long way to minimising the amount of food you throw out, saving you money and helping the environment.
- 3. Meat consumption - Reducing meat consumption is one of the most effective ways of reducing the proportion of our carbon footprint derived from food.

4. Cooking efficiently - While we can do a lot to reduce the carbon footprint of the food we eat through careful purchasing decisions, much of the energy used in the story of food falls to the way we cook it once we get it home. A few simple tips can dramatically cut the energy used in cooking:

We have a map of all the local food entries in this booklet:
www.lcon.org.uk/food/local-food-suppliers/
Please have a look and share the link.

- Always use a lid on a pan to minimise heat loss.
- Ovens lose heat slowly, so make use of this momentum by turning the oven off a few minutes before cooking time is up.
- Many quick or easy-to-cook foods can be heated up in the microwave. Microwaves are very efficient because they only heat up the food or drink itself, and not the air surrounding it.
- Slow cookers may take longer to cook food, but they do it at a far lower temperature, reducing overall energy consumption.
- Conversely, pressure cookers dramatically speed up cooking time, cooking food in as little as a third of the time.
- Cooking a lot of food at once makes the best use of heat.

Act Global - Eat Local: A Food Directory for Oxford

Oxford's food consumption generates twice the amount of CO<sub>2</sub> as all the cars driven in our city. Many factors, from transport, packaging, storage, cooking methods and food waste, influence the carbon footprint of the food and drink we all enjoy.

This handy directory lists dozens of places to get good local food. It can help us eat more sustainably – to eat to respect the climate and to benefit both our community and our health.
